Taylor Farms Acquires Equinox Growers

Dr. Jake Holley

Perhaps the most notable recent development in CEA is the acquisition of Equinox Growers by Taylor Farms. The purchase of a large-scale lettuce greenhouse by one of the country's biggest salad producers marks a meaningful shift in how CEA fits into the broader food system.

Equinox operates a state-of-the-art greenhouse in Louisa, Virginia, and has only been growing for around 10 years. With around 10 acres in production, impact on the market has been immediate, highlighting how quickly well-executed CEA operations can scale and establish regional presence.

More than anything, this acquisition signals confidence—not just in a single facility, but in the role CEA can play within established consumer packaged goods supply chains. That kind of vertical integration, from production to distribution, is something the industry has long aimed for.

If this model proves successful, it could accelerate similar investments and lead to a new wave of greenhouse development across the United States.
